In the subsequent month, the government announced it was stopping all work on the contracts. The police's case was dismissed on the grounds that there was no evidence that Zakat had accepted bribes. But the three men were convicted for making false statements. They were sentenced to nine months in prison and fined SR50,000. Then last year, the government began proceedings to revoke the licences and charge them with money-laundering. As another court put it, the amnesty decision had "significantly changed the course of the case". The licences were dismissed and the two companies were fined SR1.2m. One of the financiers of the deals, Mohd Al Mujilani Al Muawwadin, who owns the Ahliyat company, was granted immunity from prosecution. He had bought up ownership of the land in the south with his father Mohd Sultan Ahlami, who was also charged. All three men pleaded guilty to money-laundering and false statements, and agreed to pay a total of SR3.6m in fines. Abu Dhabi's authorities use the definition of money-laundering as incorporating and failing to disclose the identity of a person in accordance with UAE law. As the Bani Yas cases prove, even when the case against you is based on false and inaccurate charges, there is little recourse. "There is no rule of law at work," says Mr Al Owais, a co-founder of Human Rights Watch in the UAE. "The Emiratis were not punished, and the dozens of other activists who have taken part in protests are all sitting in a cell." The same applies in the cases of the four local activists from the UAE who have been held at Guantánamo Bay for more than 10 years, even though the US courts have already acknowledged they have been cleared for release. Their names have been removed from the official Guantánamo list of 779 prisoners. They could be freed before the end of the year. Professor O'Connell, a senior lecturer
