Cognitive behavioral therapy (CBT) is the most empirically supported therapy for irritable bowel syndrome (IBS), yet there are few guidelines regarding which treatment modality to use for IBS. The primary objective of this study was to determine whether a home-based telephone CBT (HTCBT) intervention would be equivalent to an in-person hospital-based cognitive behavioral therapy (HBCBT) intervention for individuals with IBS in terms of symptom severity. A secondary objective was to determine whether subgroup differences existed between the HTCBT and HBCBT groups in terms of symptom severity. Participants with IBS (n = 95) were randomized to receive either HBCBT or HTCBT for 6 months. Symptom severity was measured using the IBS Symptom Severity Index. All participants were provided telephone sessions and a home-based treatment manual was provided to the HBCBT participants. Post hoc analyses included analyses of symptom severity by age, sex, severity of depression, duration of illness, and baseline symptom severity. We found no difference in outcomes between HBCBT and HTCBT at post-treatment, 3-month, or 6-month follow-up. There was also no significant difference between groups in the subgroups for age, sex, severity of depression, duration of illness, or baseline symptom severity. This study was limited by the lack of a control group and lack of a comparison of a 6-month versus 12-month treatment program. This study demonstrates that there are no differences in symptom severity between a hospital-based and home-based version of CBT in the treatment of IBS.Q: ASP.Net MVC - Controller not found in vs2010 This is my first time using an MVC project.
