The electrochemical response of the glucose biosensor, based on the glucose oxidase from Aspergillus niger, was evaluated at high glucose concentrations. The analytical performance was characterized by the limit of detection, sensitivity and the dynamic range. The response was compared with the current generated by the enzymatic method and the transduction current of a glucometer. The change in the structure of the enzyme was followed by fluorescence spectroscopy and circular dichroism (CD). We show that the changes in the active site, due to the high glucose concentration, do not affect the selectivity of the biosensor. Therefore, glucose biosensors based on A. niger glucose oxidase can be used to determine glucose in the presence of other monosaccharides.
