When we think about our streets, most of us think about that construction phase of the year when the streets are narrowed and restricted for our own safety. How would we navigate this new world with added pedestrian and bike lanes? Some of the things that come to mind: People will look for new routes, with less usage of streets. Getting to new routes is very inconvenient, so people will use transit. We will see a huge increase in injuries and deaths caused by drivers getting distracted by their phone and texting. How will people feel if they are blocked from using a new route and need to take a longer, more expensive route? Other things that come to mind: A few years from now, the city will need to create infrastructure to handle all the increased traffic. The city will need to plan for all this growth. What happens when no new development is allowed? What if no one wants to live in the city centre? Will the city have to plan for all this growth, or will it be an all-or-nothing situation, where the city doesn't allow anything in the core? Many people feel that they need their land to stay in their communities and to keep their culture. They do not want to see their "downtown" turned into a mall full of chain stores. These are all valid concerns. But they need to be balanced against the safety and convenience needs of the city and how it is projected to grow. So what happens when we don't follow the rules? Research has shown that when we put in more pedestrian-friendly streets and more protected bike lanes 1d6a3396d6
