The p16/CDKN2A/MTS1/INK4A tumor suppressor gene has been implicated in hereditary nonpolyposis colorectal cancer (HNPCC). The p16/CDKN2A gene, however, is not inactivated in HNPCC and alterations in the expression and function of the gene are associated with sporadic cancers. To determine whether an alteration of the CDKN2B/MTS1 gene, which is located less than 1 kb downstream of the p16/CDKN2A gene, can be detected in HNPCC kindreds, we used a panel of 18 HNPCC-derived cell lines and seven cell lines derived from non-HNPCC tumors. No alteration of CDKN2B/MTS1 was detected in any of these kindreds. However, there was a deletion in the middle of the gene, and we speculate that this deletion may have functional consequences for the gene. The normal CDKN2B/MTS1 gene is unlikely to be a tumor suppressor in HNPCC.[The first-aid of tinnitus]. Tinnitus is a symptom that patients frequently refer to physicians. The patients have the idea that the tinnitus is a disease like any other disease, including social ones. Thus, it is not uncommon to have patients neglecting their first aid. It is necessary to inform the patients about their tinnitus. We must understand that tinnitus is not just a symptom, but a disease, which requires professional medical attention. We must understand that a patient who has tinnitus has a disease that needs a medical treatment. A problem that is not solved will turn into a disease. We must have a plan for the treatment of a patient who complains of tinnitus in order to give him or her a correct treatment and to lessen the burden of the patients, and to relieve the physicians from the burden of patients who do not pay attention to their 1d6a3396d6
